Administrative/Biographical History

On December 4, 1869, Nathan Cook Meeker published "The Call" in the New York Tribune at the advice of his employer, Horace Greeley. In the article, Meeker laid out his plans to establish a colony in Colorado which would extol the virtues of Christianity and temperance and promote irrigation, farming, and semi-communal living. The colony that Meeker established in early 1870 was originally named the Union Colony, but it was later renamed Greeley in honor of Horace Greeley.

Meeker called for as many as fifty people to establish the colony. Ten would need $10,000 or more, or twenty would need $5,000 each. All others could have anywhere between $200 and $1000 available to pool resources for the community.

The proposed settlement was to include tracts of land divided into ten acres apiece. These lots would then be divided into eight sections each for building purposes. Each family in the colony was to be apportioned between forty to 160 acres each for farming and grazing. The more desirable lots, as well as lots in the town, were to be sold and the proceeds were also to be pooled for the betterment of the community. Meeker thought it very important for the town to have a church, town hall, a school, and a library from the outset. He also believed that it was best for members of the colony to live within the town, even though many colonists owned land outside of town that they farmed. He wrote, "Some of the advantages of settling in a village will be: easy access to schools and public places, meetings, lectures, and the like, and society can be had at once. In planting, in fruit-growing, and improving homes generally, the skill and experience of greater progress can be made than where each lives isolated."

"The Call" was published twice in the New York Tribune during December of 1869. Meeker had hoped to receive 1,000 letters expressing interest in the colony, but he received over 3,000. He carefully read each letter, often writing notes on the envelope including how much money each prospective colonist could contribute to the colony, their profession, and other items of importance. The letters in this collection are just a small portion of those that Meeker received. In them, prospective colonists have attempted to "sell themselves," by demonstrating their hard work, temperance, faith, and passion for adventure.

Scope and Content

The large majority of this collection consists of correspondence, but there are also calling cards, membership cards, business cards, and a Bible. All of the correspondence is in response to Nathan Meeker's call to join the Union Colony, which was published in the New York Tribune in December of 1869.

System of

Arrangement

As no original order could be established, an imposed order was given. Items in this collection are arranged alphabetically, by last name of the writer. Other non-correspondence items have been divided categorically and placed at the end of the collection.
